Poverty is the Root Cause for Crime in the Society: A Human Rights Concern

-Huma Khan¹

Introduction

"Poverty is the parent of revolution and crime."

—Aristotle

Poverty and crime are two interconnected issues that have been studied by scholars and policymakers for decades. While poverty does not necessarily lead to crime, there is a strong correlation between the two. In this essay, I will discuss the relationship between poverty and crime, the factors that contribute to this relationship, and potential solutions to address both issues. It is essential to understand the relationship between poverty and crime. Research has shown that people living in poverty are more likely to commit crimes than those who are not poor. According to a report by the National Bureau of Economic Research, individuals living in poverty are three times more likely to be incarcerated than those who are not poor.² This correlation is not just limited to violent crimes but also includes property crimes such as theft and burglary. The reasons for this relationship are complex and multifaceted. One factor that contributes to this relationship is the lack of opportunities available to individuals living in poverty. People living in poverty often have limited access to education, employment, and other resources that can help them succeed in life. This lack of opportunities can lead to feelings of frustration, hopelessness, and desperation, which can increase the likelihood of criminal behavior.³

Another factor that contributes to the relationship between poverty and crime is the social environment in which people live. People
