Children of Conflict: The Far-reaching Consequences of Exposure to War Crimes and Armed Conflict

Mohd Ubais Ansari¹

ABSTRACT

Since the dawn of time, children have been the most vulnerable population and have required protection in times of war and armed conflict. To safeguard children, state institutions and international organizations are now involved in this matter and have established regulations and made a fair number of conventional laws. Numerous provisions protecting them may be identified, but only after a thorough investigation has been done. They have the most unheard voices, making them the most vulnerable. When there is a continuing armed conflict, it is evident that certain institutions are failing to provide enough protection. That does not imply that there were no child victims in other nations or during other violent conflicts. The most silent among us have endured horrors in the past and present, and something needs to be done to put an end to it.

This paper deals with the definition of war crimes and the impact of the same on children making them the most vulnerable section in times of armed conflict. It is pertinent to note that this paper also focuses on the challenges and opportunities in the process of advancing justice for child
